Directors Notes

"This above all: to thine own self be true,/And it must follow, as the night the day,/Thou canst not then be false to any man" (Hamlet Act 1, scene 33, 78-81).

When I set out to direct this production, I often revisited this quote which book-writer, Heather Hach, so wisely placed in this show's final number. Having grown up with a highly motivated blonde sister of my own, I was familiar with the MGM film and, as a frequent show-tune listener, the musical itself. I took it upon myself to forget everything I knew about Reese Witherspoon, Laura Bell Bundy (Elle Woods, Original Broadway Cast), and pink as a fashion statement. As I scoured the script for a deeper, more implicit meaning than Hoku's "It's a Perfect Day," I learned that this is not merely a story about a girl who chases her love interest to Harvard Law and learns some life lessons along the way; it is a story about defining one's self. The quest to find what defines one's self is far from bubbly and ditzzy; it is an endeavor that authors and poets like William Shakespeare have been writing about for centuries. Furthermore, I cannot think of a more appropriate age group than young adults to mount a production about finding one's place in the world. I charged this production's lead with stepping beyond the limits of an air-headed debutante with an uncanny knack for law and, instead, searching for the true seriousness that defines Elle Woods.

Although the actors are not speaking in iambic pentameter, the basic set was somewhat inspired by the open, yet intimate Globe Theatre in London, where the works of William Shakespeare continue to be performed. Also unique to this production is its staging in a three-quarter thrust (audience on three sides) as opposed to the traditional proscenium-style theatre, in which certain technical elements of this show could have been more easily achieved. However, it is my hope that by sacrificing a massive performance space, complete with fly system and the works, for a more personal and intimate performance, the audience will ultimately have a more rewarding experience.

Best,

Joe
